

说明

2019年考研英语二 passage 1.

出自《大西洋月刊》When Guilt Is Good。主要内容是关于to plumb the moral conscience of small children，即研究小孩子的道德感。

最后的答案是， the 3-year-olds' behavior varied depending on whether they felt responsible，即小孩子的道德感取决于他们是不是认为自己应负责任。

PS：原文比较长， 考研出题人只选了红字部分作为考研真题。

正文

A few years ago, researchers in Germany set out to plumb the moral consciences of small children. They invited a series of 2- and 3-year-olds to play with a marble track in a lab. Close to the track—in auspiciously close—was a block tower that one of the adult experimenters claimed to have painstakingly constructed. Just before turning her back, she asked them not to damage it.

Needless to say, the game was rigged. After a few runs, a marble would knock over part of the tower, at which point the experimenter responded with what the resulting journal article described as a “mildly sad” tone. “Oh no,” she would say, then ask what had happened. In some versions of the experiment, the child seemed to be to blame; in others, an adult who was helping with the experiment toppled the tower. The kids' reactions revealed a lot about how social-emotional development progresses during these key years. While many of the 2-year-olds seemed sympathetic to the researcher's plight, the 3-year-olds went beyond sympathy. When they believed that they'd caused the accident, they were more likely than the 2-year-olds to express regret and try to fix the tower. In other words, the 3-year-olds' behavior varied depending on whether they felt responsible.

Their actions, according to Amrisha Vaish, the University of Virginia psychology researcher who led the study, demonstrate "the beginnings of real guilt and real conscience." Vaish is one of a number of scholars studying how, when, and why guilt emerges in children. 01 Unlike so-called basic emotions such as sadness, fear, and anger, guilt emerges a little later, in conjunction with a child's growing grasp of social and moral norms. Children aren't born knowing how to say "I'm sorry"; rather, they learn over time that such statements appease parents and friends—and their own consciences. This is why researchers generally regard so-called moral guilt, in the right amount, to be a good thing :A child who claims responsibility for knocking over a tower and tries to rebuild it is engaging in behavior that's not only reparative but also prosocial.

🌟 in conjunction with 与~一起

● Afterwards Barry knew that no congratulations would be given to him in conjunction with this failed event.

后来，巴里了解到，受这次失败的牵连，给他的祝贺也泡汤了。

● The army should have operated in conjunction with the fleet to raid the enemy's coast.

军队应该和舰队行动，袭击敌方的海岸线。

🌟 a growing grasp of

● A firm grasp of contrarian logic is needed for understanding markets.

要了解市场，就要牢牢掌握反向投资逻辑。

● He had as firm as a grasp of superstar economics as Mr. Cruise, one of the world's best-paid film actors.

他和上面那位全球片酬最高的影星（Cruise）一样，牢牢把握住了超级巨星经济学的基本原理。

● She says she's beginning to get the full grasp of what she did and what it meant.

她说她开始领会到她做了什么，造成了什么后果。

● A superb teacher, with a fine grasp of the appropriate metaphor, and tailoring his teachings to the audience at hand.

一位出色的老师，懂得隐喻，并根据听众调整教学内容。

002 In the popular imagination, of course, guilt still gets a bad rap. It evokes Freud's ideas and religious hang-ups. More important, guilt is deeply uncomfortable—it's the emotional equivalent of wearing a jacket weighted with stones. Who would inflict it upon a child? Yet this understanding is outdated. "There has been a kind of revival or a rethinking about what guilt is and what role guilt can serve," Vaish says, adding that this revival is part of a larger recognition that emotions aren't binary—feelings that may be advantageous in one context may be harmful in another. Jealousy and anger, for example, may have evolved to alert us to important inequalities. Too much happiness (think mania) can be destructive.

🌟 popular imagination 大众印象

● Most "witches" were hanged, rather than the burning at the stake of popular imagination.

多数“女巫”被绞死了，而不是常人以为的被绑在树桩上烧死。

● In the popular imagination, Socrates may be the first deep thinker in Western civilization, but in Mr. Johnson's view he was also an anti-intellectual.

人们普遍认为，苏格拉底是西方文明中第一个深刻的思想家，但约翰逊把其看成是一个反知识分子的人。

🌟 equivalent of 同等物

● That's the equivalent of every ounce of gold dug up by every gold miner in the world for the next five years.

这相当于全球所有黄金开采商未来五年的全部黄金产量。

● In the course of his 40-year travelling life he went the equivalent of ten times round the equator, covering 6000 miles or so a year.

在其四十年的旅途中，他走过的路程可以绕赤道十周，每年约六千英里。

● A year today is the equivalent of several decades, a century or even a longer period in ancient times.

现在的一年抵得上过去古老社会几十年、上百年甚至更长的时间。

🌟 serve the role

● Killing must serve a purpose, otherwise it's just plain murder.

杀人行为一一定要有目的，否则就只是杀戮。

● They are a conspicuous sign of misery but they serve a purpose.

他们虽然意味着不幸却有着它的道理。

● To drag Iran into the Iraqi mire wouldn't serve Iranian interests.

● Rural community charter schools are often opened to serve local needs.

003 And guilt, by prompting us to think more deeply about our goodness, can encourage humans to atone for errors and fix relationships. Guilt, in other words, can help hold a cooperative species together. It is a kind of social glue.

🌟 atone for 抵偿

● Jack tried to atone for his rudeness by sending her some flowers.

杰克想给她送些鲜花以弥补他的粗鲁。

● No amount of riches can atone for poverty of character.

万贯家财亦难弥补人格之贫乏。

● How can I atone for hurting your feelings?

我怎样才能补偿伤你感情之过呢？

● Nothing can atone for the loss of one's health.

健康无可弥补。

004 Viewed in this light, guilt is an opportunity. Work by Tina Malti, a psychology professor at the University of Toronto, suggests that guilt may compensate for an emotional deficiency. In a number of studies, Malti and others have shown that guilt and sympathy (and its close cousin empathy) may represent different pathways to cooperation and sharing. Some kids who are low in sympathy may make up for that shortfall by experiencing more guilt, which can rein in their nastier impulses. And vice versa: High sympathy can substitute for low guilt.

🌟 be low in

ethanol is fairly low in economic value.

"The police profession is low in status and prestige."

🌟 nasty 恶毒的；令人不快的；

● One has no business to eat a man's salt and then say nasty things about him.

一个人没有权利一面享受人家的款待，一面又讲人家的坏话。

● There's no need to be nasty or to put up with attacks someone else.

没必要变得讨厌或者忍受谁的攻击。

● Her mother and father are going through a nasty divorce.

她的父母正在办离婚，闹得非常不愉快。

005 In a 2014 study, for example, Malti and a colleague looked at 244 children, ages 4, 8, and 12. Using caregiver assessments and the children's self-observations, they rated each child's overall sympathy level and his or her tendency to feel negative emotions (like guilt and sadness) after moral transgressions. Then the kids were handed stickers and chocolate coins, and given a chance to share them with an anonymous child. For the low-sympathy kids, how much they shared appeared to turn on how inclined they were to feel guilty. The guilt-prone ones shared more, even though they hadn't magically become more sympathetic to the other child's deprivation.

🌟 guilt-prone 易内疚的

● flood-prone areas/places

● Bogart ate glass till his mouth bled; the accident prone Hemingway ran with the bulls and hunted big game .

鲍嘉曾口吞玻璃直至鲜血淋漓，一生多灾多难的海明威更是曾经在狂奔的野牛群中狩猎。

● Cameron Hall is injury-prone. "Everything he does is full tilt, and he gets hurt all the time, " says his father, Phil.

卡梅隆·霍尔非常容易受伤，他的父亲菲尔说，“他做任何事都拼尽全力，因此他也总是受伤。”

006 "That's good news," Malti says. "We can be prosocial because of our empathetic proclivity, or because we caused harm and we feel regret."

Malti describes guilt as a self-directed emotion, elicited when you act in a way that's out of keeping with your conscience. Sympathy and empathy are other-directed. A child who isn't inclined to feel bad for a classmate whose toy car she stole might nevertheless feel uncomfortable with the idea of herself as a thief—and return the to y. Guilt can include sympathy, Malti says, but it doesn't have to. She's agnostic about which of the two paths children take, so long as they treat one another well.

This is a provocative idea at a moment when parents and educators have come to almost fetishize empathy—when a child's ability to put herself in another's shoes seems like the apex of goodness. Parents encourage children to consider how their peers feel when they don't share their toys. Preschool teachers instruct students to consider one another "friends," implying that good behavior is predicated on affection. Elementary schools base anti-bullying curricula around altruistic concepts like love and kindness.

When it comes to helping kids manage relationships and tamp down aggression, "schools and programs have almost exclusively focused on empathy promotion," Malti says. "I think it's incredibly important to nurture empathy, but I think it's equally important to promote guilt."

If you still find the idea of guilt-tripping your child unpalatable, keep in mind that we're talking about a very specific kind of guilt. This is not telling your child that her disobedience proves she's unworthy, or describing how painful it was to give birth to her. This is not pressuring your grown son or daughter to hurry up and have babies before you die. In short, this is not your grandmother's guilt-trip.

You don't want a child to feel bad about who she is (that's called shaming) or responsible for things outside her control (which can give rise to maladaptive or neurotic guilt; see the child who feels guilty for her parents' divorce). Malti points out that a child's age and disposition are also important considerations; some may be temperamentally guilt-prone and require a lighter touch. The point is to encourage both goodness and resilience. We all make mistakes, and ideally we use them to propel ourselves toward better behavior.

Proper guilt-tripping connects the dots between your child's actions and an outcome—without suggesting anything is wrong or bad about her—and focuses on how best to repair the harm she's caused. In one fell swoop it inspires both guilt and empathy, or what Martin Hoffman, an emeritus professor at NYU known for his extensive work on empathy, has termed “empathy-based guilt.” Indeed, you may already be guilt-tripping your child (in a healthy way!) without realizing it. As in: “Look, your brother is crying because you just threw his Beanie Boo in the toilet.” Hopefully, the kid is moved to atone for her behavior, and a parent might help her think through how to do that.

Work by Renee Patrick, a psychology professor at the University of Tampa, shows that it’s important for parents to express themselves in a warm and loving way: A parent who seems chastising or rejecting can induce anxiety in a child, and do nothing to encourage healthy behavior. Patrick’s work also shows that kids whose parents used a strategy intended to elicit “empathy-based guilt” during their adolescence tended to see moral concepts like fairness and honesty as more central to their sense of themselves. (A related technique that’s been found effective in adolescents involves what Patrick calls “parental expression of disappointed expectations”—which is as harrowing as it sounds.)

Joan Grusec, a psychologist and researcher in parenting and children’s development, and a colleague of Malti’s at the University of Toronto, says it’s important to make the what-you-can-do-about-it part a discussion between parent and child, instead of a sermon. Forcing a child to behave morally may prevent her from internalizing the lesson you’re trying to impart. And, she says, such a conversation may work better “once everybody has simmered down,” rather than in the heat of a dispute. She points to research on what academics call reminiscence, which suggests that discussing a transgression after the fact may better help children understand what they did wrong.

Of course, knowing when to feel bad and what to do about it are things we could all benefit from. Malti’s research may focus on kids, but guilt is a core human emotion—an inevitability for people of every age. And she believes that it has the potential to be especially helpful now, in a world that is growing more divided and atomized.

She argues that guilt may have the ability to bring us together, not despite but because of its focus on the self. The proposition is radical. What if the secret to treating one another better is thinking about ourselves not less, but more?

思考题

21. Researchers think that guilt can be a good thing because it may help_____.

- A) regulate a child's basic emotions
- B) improve a child's intellectual ability
- C) foster a child's moral development
- D) intensify a child's positive feelings

22. According to paragraph 2, many people still consider guilt to be _____.

- A) deceptive
- B) burdensome
- C) addictive
- D) deception

23. Vaish holds that the rethinking about guilt comes from an awareness that_____.

- A) emotions are context-independent
- B) emotions are socially constructive
- C) emotional stability can benefit health
- D) an emotion can play opposing roles

24. Malti and others have shown that cooperation and sharing _____
—.

- A. may help correct emotional deficiencies
- B. can result from either sympathy or guilt
- C. can bring about emotional satisfaction
- D. may be the outcome of impulsive acts

25. The word “transgressions” (Line 4, Para.5) is closest in meaning to _____.

- A. teachings
- B. discussions
- C. restrictions
- D. wrongdoings